state of affairs which he says might one day become a serious menace for French domination in North Africa.

Notwithstanding the satisfactory economic condition of Algeria and the comparative prosperity of the natives in consequence of a good harvest, the Arab population manifests the greatest hostility towards the French.
There have been numerous robberies in many places, particularly of cattle, as well as the murder of several Europeans—a state of affairs which has naturally excited much feeling among the French settlers in the interior, where they live in the midst of a population 20 times as numerous as themselves. The telegraph brings daily accounts of fresh attacks, and two days ago the gendarmes were mal-treated by a furious crowd of Arabs at Ain Bessam. These incidents are in no way due to any relaxation of administrative surveillance. It is not impossible that the crimes which are taking place in Algeria have some connexion with the revival of fanaticism now manifest throughout all North Africa, "which Germany regards with less apprehension than we do, and which she seems even to encourage by her attitude towards the Moroccan Government. We have reason to be on our guard in that direction also. The Maghzen has assumed airs towards us and taken proceedings such as it had never taken before, even last year at the most critical stage of the Moroccan crisis.

"The inhabitants of Taflet, supported in their hostility towards our commercial penetration, resort to all sorts of threats and intrigues to boycott the products transported by our railway. . . . The tranquillity of the economic life of a part of Algeria is thus daily threatened. Besides, the Berates of Taflet spare no pains to induce the tribes subject to us on the frontier to leave our territory and even to join in the attack upon us.
This is a thoroughly intolerable state of affairs.
It is known that in the north the disposition of the Moroccan authorities towards us is scarcely better. We can hardly count upon anything more than their inaction. . . . I am told that in the settlement of these questions, both in the north and south of our frontier region, the Governor is determined to maintain his composure. At the same time the Charbonnier affair has shown us what can be secured from the Maghzen by an energetic demonstration. If the Moroccan Government does not accede to our very moderate demands, which are but too well justified, we shall remember that a strong policy is often necessary at Fez. As will be seen, the Moroccan policy is far more than one
