in securing intelligent handling of the great problem of the settlement of officers in civil life. At the same time something must be done to prevent the growth of this great octopus, which in extravagance is probably typical of the new departments with which the State is threatened. There is a particular danger in the ambitions of the officials of this Ministry. It is conceivable they may attempt to secure compulsory powers to enable them to control the placing in employment of the whole body of workers, industrial and professional. If some of the officials had their way, employers would be able to obtain their assistants only through the Labour Exchanges. Their attempts to place officers in civil life are bound to fail. First of all, there are very few vacancies, and this fact must be recognized at once. Since the beginning of the year the department has registered about 3,000. It is likely many of these vacancies were notified by other Government departments always reaching out to swell their staffs. Apart from the fact that there are few vacancies those offered will be most difficult to fill from the men who are available on the card indexes of the appointments Department. As a Department of State the Ministry of Labour is compelled to make efforts to place in employment everyone who offers. The result is that the employers who rightly consider the labour in the good, bad and indifferent. An attempt is made by comparing two sets of card index particulars to send men whose qualifications on paper would seem to fit in with the employer's requirements, also registered on paper. This is an almost impossible method borrowed from the Employment Exchanges. If the department have not a man registered who would seem to fit in to the job, the nearest is sent. Employers who rightly consider the selection of personnel as one of their chief duties are not helped in the slightest degree by the officials' selection of men to be sent. The Department have so far steadily avoided giving the numbers of men placed in this way, but it is obviously trifling. The officials, who while courteous, are not experienced in commerce or industry, can do no more than record particulars on cards and give applicants official information. Best help must be given to officers on their return to civil life. The existing method leads only to disappointment, and is a grave waste of public funds. The majority of young officers stand in need of sage council and experienced advice. They have never worked except in the Army. You cannot catalogue them on cards. The problem must be dealt with by men able to refuse to send to men who would be obviously unsuitable. A man at present asking for a job may be quite incapable of performing it submitted for a position that may be vacant because the department must try to place him. This is unfair to the men themselves, and prejudices the employer against officers as a body from which to recruit assistance.

While the department has proposals in mind to place in the hands of the officers a certain number of small businesses, the use made of this suggestion is to sidetrack the efforts of voluntary committees into examining candidates who must training at the expense of the State; doubt a necessary and useful step, but far too limited in its scope. The Ministry of Labour cannot make jobs. It is true, but its bungling of the officer problem by unintelligent attempts to bring them into touch with employers is standing in the way of the careers of large numbers of our young men.
