GERMAN OFFICER ON TREATMENT BY BRITISH FLEET.

Reuter's Cologne correspondent gives extracts from an article by a German naval commander in a Cologne newspaper and a Cologne newspaper. The writer was evidently impresed by cantion with which the British fleet received the German ships, all of the British waships being cleared for immediate action if necessary, with torpedoes ready in "Great British." he says, "could bardly realise that German officers and sailors were really going to hand over their fleet in full light of day and without a struggle. "The British could not guess the lament." The British could not guess the lament brought German naval power, how all its discipline had been undyrmined, all its lofty ideals choked by more selfish eggism, and the once powerful fleet reagons, and the control of the British officers," he says. "Only a slight trace of respectfulness was still visible among the mean statement of the British officers," he says. "Only a slight trace of respectfulness was still visible among the mean still be supported by the says was the behaviour of the British officers," he says. "At sunset we hauled down for ever our flag, that hitherto had never struck to British guas." At sunset we hauled down for ever our flag, that hitherto had never struck to British guas. "At sunset we hauled down for ever our flag, that hitherto had never struck to British guas." At sunset we hauled down for ever our flag, that hitherto had never struck to British guas. Supply doubtful anecdotes of conversations held with various British efficers.

One of the first questions asked by them, he says, was why Germany had not held the Western front at all cost a little clares, "have obtained better terms, as Great Britain had absolutely set her heart on peace before the end of the year."

The somewhat cool attitude of his hosts was explained by another officer's remark to the effect that the German commanders were thought to be Bookherists in disguise, were thought to be Bookherists in disguise, were thought to be Bookherists in disguise,
